The Wolf.

On the Wednesday evening Dec. 8, at the Grand Opera House Sam S. and Lee Shubert will present Eugene Walter's great American drama, "The Wolf," after long engagements both in Chicago and New York. This romance of the great Canadian Northwest holds its audience closely throughout a series of scenes, ending in one of the most cleverly conceived and intensely exciting climaxes yet seen on the stage. The story of "The Wolf," has to do with one Andrew MacFavish, a rugged old Scotch settler, who, deserted by his Swedish wife, is driven to monomania by the blow. He believes that all women and especially the pretty daughter she has left him are filled with evil. He is very hard with the girl, but nevertheless guards her so jealously that she reaches her 21st year without having even heard the word "Love."

Jules Beaubien, a stalwart young French Canadian, who spends his summers in the neighborhood, learns to love the innocent girl, but postpones his declaration because of her sweet childlikeness. He is attended by a faithful Frenchman, Batiste LeGrand, who was the finance of Jules' sister, Annette, dead by her own hand after desertion by the man with whom she had eloped.

William MacDonald, a railroad contractor from the States, arrives and applies himself assiduously to the winning of the Scotchman's pretty daughter, Hilda. Jules discovers that he is the man responsible for Annette's sad end and from that moment on it is certain that the contractor will meet death at the hands of either Jules or Batiste, with the odds strongly in favor of the cool and smiling Beaubien.

MacDonald and Beaubien declare their intention to each other and the battle for the love of little Hilda is on. The American has told her many stories of Broadway and its luxuries but nothing of his wife and children in New York. She is undecided until having won her father's co-operation through a clever lie which holds out the promise that the old Scotchman will realize the hope of a lifetime and return in wealth to his native land, MacDonald seizes her and reveals to her his true character. She repulses him with the strength of desperation and Beaubien arrives just in time to defend her from the mad old father, who is about to kill her with his hands."

Beaubien, Batiste and the girl escape in a canoe. Then follows the much discussed "big scene" of the play. The little party arrives at a portage in the woods just as dark comes on. Gradually it becomes darker and darker, until finally there is not a semblance of light save for a smoldering camp fire. Beaubien has declared his love to Hilda and she feels at last "the great desire" as she calls the realization of affection. He has sent her away in the canoe with Huntley and Batiste and awaits the arrival of his enemy, whom he knows to be close on his trail.

Suddenly, without the slightest warning save the crackle of a twig, plainly heard in the silent scene, comes the blaze and report of a shot from the darkness. Beaubien throws himself to the ground, and MacDonald, believing him dead, or at least wounded, creeps upon him and then follows the furious fight, which cannot be seen, but every moment a muttered word is heard. At last, after fully a minute of fighting, a knife flashes and a body drops. By the small glimmer of a match struck by the victor and held over the vanquished, the audience sees the two faces, that of Jules bending over the still features of MacDonald.
